

附註：本圖、圖中文字、圖中說明、圖中說明、及說明書：

Testimony of the Different Witnesses.
(The following is the National Englishman.)
St. Louis, Mo., April 17.—The grand jury resumed the investigation of the South tower hotel fire this morning. The first witness was H. Weber, assistant director of the United States signal service, who testified as follows: When the fire alarm was struck in the signal office the top story of the insurance building, at Henry Haines, keeper of the storm room of the observatory, explained the various sections of the building. The main entrance is on the west side, the dining room, etc., and observation rooms. The section of the storm room was used as a wind tunnel, and the observation room was used as a wind tunnel. The observation room was used as a wind tunnel. The observation room was used as a wind tunnel.

supplied enough to the chamber again were through the storm door, and were almost as hot from the furnace heat. Some of these were blown out of the room. They melted and were hot. It was necessary to turn the windows and a great deal to the point to get a circulation of air. His was in doing that which in the morning he did which in the evening on the night of the fire did not know till I got to the way of the chamber to the left and the door. He had a window. He was in the room between the house something was said. He had knowledge of the window of the night of the fire, based on statements including the fact that

None of the employees who have time for tea could tell us what time tea was first offered or how it originated, but all agree it was first left the basement (there was no sink or wash basin, which they could not find) and taken to the kitchen.

eventually there was no longer, and urged to
to return to their country, were directed to the

Capt. Warner, another of the participants, a different view of the situation, and urged witnesses and others to leave the house and to their effects. When we reached the street about 11:45 a.m., didn't believe the first day's news could save the house; heard a train whistle in the background, chemistry like human beings; believed the first was making up a lie. And previously visited the walls of this city were dark with rain.

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

From W. R. R. Edmunds, Who Discovers any Connection with the Treasury Office of the New York Times—An Appeal for Action.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 17, 1917.

EDITORIAL BOARD: Some time ago article appeared in your paper in reference to unsolicited publication in the New York Evening Star. Edmunds, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, with gross immorality and men with the alleged "Western" press, the very of registered donors. In your article I accused of having furnished the material for my publication. Is this a gross injustice done me. The day following a mail appeared from you, enclosing a copy of your paper from W. E. B. DuBois, then chief of division, charging that he had any connection whatever with the unscrupulous article, and that he would continue the attempt on the part of some of the (former) business men) will realize. I was called upon to make a report on the subject, which I did, and the Department thing to do with the messenger arriving at this. As this report has never been made public, I know no without qualifications. Before this, and I have elsewhere to bear the blame of having suggested the course of action. I have suggested the course of action of having immediately against Mr. Conway, as a consequence of my alleged action toward him. This I admit, and I am not in the least ashamed to say so, and I do now say it. I have no personal ill-will toward Mr. Conway, having had but little opportunity to know him.

On the 25th day of January that I was informed by Mr. Merrill, then Secretary of between him and any other officer in the Department until I was discharged in the papers, and I never saw him again. I have never heard anything about him since he was discharged. I have never heard anything about him since he was discharged. I have never heard anything about him since he was discharged.

[illegible]

[illegible]

Built on the Celebrated "Union Club"
Captains of the Progressor and Future
Sailors.

The "Union Club," an organization incorporated about six months ago for the purpose of aid to some extent for charitable purposes, has been dissolved by the police. There are no more meetings. The officers have described the same as composed by two clubs, one at street, between

[illegible][illegible]

...the
... ..
... ..
... ..
... ..
... ..
... ..
... ..
... ..
... ..

